The actors have only just met and their scripted production has dissolved into improv while the theater itself faces a similarly uncertain future. One is interrupting the others all the time trying to steer away from the humour of the fact that the stage they are on is being taken apart as they perform. Electric saws cut dry wall, asbestos, and the occasional length of piping; its the topic of conversation. The way things are going isn't good, in fact they're getting dire. The theater is dilapidated and its worth more as scrap material than real estate. The improv goes on as the actors can't agree as to wether it's even possible to stop acting. For the moment improv appears to be the best means of improvement because with out the performance there isn't much need for a theater.
